CAG POLICY BRIEF ISSUE 2026 | 4

The European Promise and Its Unequal Doors: Rethinking Access to EU Traineeships for Non-EU Nationals

Summary

KEY POINTS

1. Institutional Obstacles and Unequal Eligibility

EU institutions provide many jobs opportunities; however, eligibility criteria and nationality limitations restrict opportunities for non-EU, hence reviewing them may insure wider pool of eligible international candidates in traineeship programmes.

2. Financial Barriers

Relocation and accommodation costs as well as visa fees make traineeships in Brussels and other European cities unavailable for candidates with no money. Thus, financial support is needed to make opportunities available to people from any social background.

3. Towards A More Inclusive And Transparent Traineeship Framework

The EU needs to work on making eligibility criteria, visa processes and application requirements more transparent, as well as work on providing

The European Union describes itself as a community formed upon values shared by its member states, democratic governance, institutional cooperation, and provision for equal opportunities for all. Nevertheless, because of the uneven state of access to job opportunities in the EU for the youth of countries not belonging to the Union, it is understandable that only a small amount of non-EU nations has achieved a significant degree of political, legal, and institutional approximation to the EU.

In the case of EU candidate countries, accession to the Union implies more than just an intention to apply for membership status. It translates into many reforms, bringing national legislations in compliance with the acquis communautaire, strengthening institutional capacities, and putting continuous effort to fulfill the political and economic requirements of the EU.

Even if this is done, young professionals from non-EU countries may still face some challenges when applying for internships in EU institutions. Restrictions based on citizenship, visa requirements, costs-related issues, and uncertainties in terms of administration may prevent qualified users from taking advantage of job opportunities that would enable them to enhance their knowledge and skills gained during their internship in the EU.

The major issue is not that there needs to be an opening up of trainee programs to every nationality. The focus is on the fact that the need is to make sure that the institutions' requirement is relevant, opened, and in line with the EU's general vision for cooperation with nations that aspire to integration.

This policy brief puts forward a suggestion such as the adoption of the broad and more differentiated approach to the eligibility of traineeships, better assistance on administrative issues as well as visas, creating opportunities for the candidates from candidate countries, and enhancement of the provision of financial support for overseas job applicants.

1. Integration in the Absence of Equal Access

The EU accession procedure is based on the premise that countries wishing to join the EU undergo significant reforms and eventually bring their laws and institutions in line with European norms. In fact, the European Commission's enlargement policy highlights the importance of legal harmonization, institutional development, and democratic reforms in the accession process.

The EU and the EU candidate countries are not linked only through negotiations between their governments. Instead, the connection is made more complex by the access possibilities available to the people, especially young members of these countries' societies, who will have to contribute to their further institutional and professional development.

Internships offered by European Union institutions provide individuals with more than just work experience. Internships give trainees the chance to acquire experience in European policymaking, leading of administrative processes and cooperation of institutions as well as implementation of EU policies. This is very important for young specialists interested in questions of diplomacy, public administration and law, economics of international relations.

If the access to this type of internship is limited by nationality, it might bear negative consequences not only for individual applicants but also for young people from the countries that are trying to achieve integration with European institutions.

2. Limitations Relating to Nationality and Institutional Flexibility

The most obvious obstacles non-EU candidates face are nationality requirements. For example, EU citizenship is a requirement for the Council of the European Union's major traineeship program, while the European Commission's Blue Book operates from a different set of rules altogether, providing eligibility for EU citizens and nationals of countries that are candidates for membership, as far as those countries are governed by the pre-accession plan, while candidate applications from other non-EU citizens will be subject to special approval procedures. Additionally, there could be some positions with restrictions for non-EU nationals. Thus, it can be seen that there are differences in the access to various EU institutions/programs. Nonetheless, nationality can be viewed not only as a distinctive characteristic but also as a determinant factor that may provide the access to selection of candidates in some cases.

There may have been plausible grounds to limit access to particular posts, and they include legal obligations, nature of assigned tasks, and institutional security requirements. Such considerations, however, should not automatically require the same restrictions on both traineeships.

Many placements involve research, translation, policy analysis, communication, administrative support, or international cooperation. Institutions might consider whether broader participation in selected positions is feasible, within legal parameters, without compromising their responsibilities here. The policy question is not therefore about whether nationality should ipso facto determine access across the range of professional opportunities, but whether it is indeed necessary and proportionate to impose each restriction within any given programme or role. Openness in this context does not mean that the criteria for eligibility might not exist. Rather, it means they should not constitute barriers for qualified candidates.

3. EU Traineeship Access for Non-EU Nationals

Trainee opportunities at European Union institutions remain unequal for candidates from countries that are not part of the EU, especially those from EU-candidate countries, such as Türkiye. While the EU has directed candidates to modify their former education and development system so that it meets standards observed in Europe, emerging young professionals from these nations may still face challenges while looking for experience at EU institutions. Nationality restrictions provide an illustration of this unequal situation. For instance, the main trainee scheme organized by the Council of the EU states that the applicants should be citizens of one of the EU member countries. The traineeship scheme developed by the European Commission requires that applicants are not citizens of any EU country.

In addition to general eligibility criteria, the visa procedure, relocation expenses, and lack of financial resources may hinder candidates from the non-European Union. Barriers such as these pose a disparity between the European Union's declarations regarding equal opportunities and the actual level of involvement of youth from outside the Union in the EU activities. The issue is significant for candidate countries, whose citizens are expected to absorb and comply with the EU standards but have limited chances mainly to reach the institutions, which are responsible for EU rules and their enforcement. Changes in eligibility criteria could make visa procedures and suitable training routes for those coming from candidate countries more straightforward.

Recommendations:

1. Assessment of Eligibility Guidelines Based on Nationality

The European Union ought to take into consideration the eligibility guidelines based on nationality for traineeship programs so that qualified applicants from foreign nations, especially candidate countries of Europe like Türkiye can avail the opportunities, wherever it may be practically and legally viable. Creation of opportunities for trainees from candidate countries will enhance its relations with these countries and open up opportunities for young people to acquire work experience at EU institutions.

2. Enhancing Transparency and Accessibility

It is essential for the EU institutions to furnish clear and concise information in a centralised manner on the conditions for eligibility for traineeship, restrictions based on nationality, and procedure for application and selection. Such publication of eligibility conditions in a transparent manner will help applicants from foreign countries to find opportunities without facing impediments.

3. Overcoming Visa and Financial Obstacles.

The European Union ought to better inform people about visa procedures, relocation requirements, and the costs involved in their traineeship programs. Whenever possible, financial aid, travel grants, and accommodation assistance should be offered to eligible applicants who are experiencing financial difficulty. In this way, one would be able to gain access to the opportunities lying ahead through his/her qualifications, not his/her being rich or having no difficulties with the bureaucracy.

Key Idea to Stress Out

It is necessary to enhance the EU traineeship program for non-EU individuals especially residents of candidate countries who must adopt the European system and yet are hindered by their origin in terms of nationality restrictions, visas, and finances. This policy proposal aims to achieve two goals: to increase the accessibility of trainee programs in EU institutions for eligible candidates from candidate nations and make sure the EU adheres to the principle of equal opportunity as well as youth involvement.

References :

1. Council of the European Union. (n.d.). Traineeships: Frequently asked questions. Consilium. https://www.consilium.europa.eu/en/general-secretariat/careers/traineeships/frequently-asked-questions/

Consilium

2. Council of the European Union. (n.d.). Who can apply for a traineeship? Consilium. https://www.consilium.europa.eu/en/general-secretariat/careers/traineeships/who-can-apply-for-a-traineeship/

Consilium

3. European Commission. (2026). Rules governing the official traineeship programme of the European Commission: Commission Decision of 16 July 2026 (C(2026) 4902). EUR-Lex. https://eur-lex.europa.eu/eli/C/2026/3791/oj/eng

EUR-Lex. https://eur-lex.europa.eu/eli/C/2026/3791/oj/eng

4. European Commission. (n.d.). Eligibility criteria: Administrative traineeship for university graduates. Blue Book Traineeship Programme. https://traineeships.ec.europa.eu/administrative-traineeship-university-graduates/eligibility-criteria-administrative-traineeship-university-graduates_en

European Commission

5. European Commission. (2025). 2025 Communication on EU enlargement policy. Directorate-General for Enlargement and Eastern Neighbourhood. https://enlargement.ec.europa.eu/document/download/eb69a890-40d6-4696-801e-612d51709fdd_en

Enlargement and Eastern Neighbourhood

6. European Commission. (n.d.). Enlargement countries. https://commission.europa.eu/strategy-and-policy/policies/justice-and-fundamental-rights/enlargement-countries_en

